Lord CLIVE's SPEECH in the House of Commons, in defence of himself.

MR. SPEAKER,

THE press has, for some time past, teemed with so many reflections upon the servants of the East India company, and particularly upon me, that, were I not first to remove the bad impressions thus made, I am afraid any observations I could make upon the present subject of your deliberations would have little or no effect, except perhaps to my own prejudice. My situation is delicate, and little accustomed as I am to address this august House, I may sink under its difficulties; but, as my honour is concerned, a necessity extorts it from me, I must run the hazard, however much I may fail in the attempt. It is not that I have any doubts of the goodness of my cause; on the contrary, I hope it will make me full amends for the insufficiency of the advocate. At any rate, the House will show some indulgence to a man, pleading for what is dearer than life itself, his reputation and honest fame. Nor do I wish that my defence should be solely confined to these walls; I speak likewise to the gallery, and, in general, to my country, upon whom I put myself, not only without reluctance, but with alacrity.

It is well known, that the last time I went to India I was called upon by the Proprietary in general, without any solicitation on my part, to step forth once more to their assistance, in every critical emergency. Possessed as I was not only of an independent, but of an affluent fortune, happy in my connections, happy in my relations, happy in my family, happy in my friends, happy in every thing but my health, which I lost in the company's service, never to be regained, how can I be supposed to have undertaken the arduous task imposed upon me by the company from pecuniary motives? I must have been the most mercenary of men, to have, upon such principles, again tempted the faithful deep, to have again exposed my enfeebled constitution to the sultry climate of Hindostan, and to the fatigues and dangers of war. Sir, I undertook this voyage from a nobler view, from a principle of gratitude, from the desire of doing essential service to the company, under whose auspices I acquired my fortune and my fame. Were not this the case, would I have embarked in this affair upon conditions that left me poorer by many thousand pounds than when I quitted England? This, if necessary, I can prove by authentic documents; and, I trust, it will at least exempt me from the charge of avarice or rapacity.

Suffer me, after this general observation, to defend to particulars. The charges brought against me are all contained in a paper, which was sent me by the Secretary of the East-India company in a letter, that begged I would transmit to him any remarks, or any defence I chose to make. I begged to be excused from that trouble, till I should learn what use they meant to make of the paper and of my defence. Here the matter rested.

The first charge is, that I carried on an iniquitous trade in cotton. I answer, that in the first place I never traded, and that I derive every farthing I am worth in the world from being at the head of the army. In the second place I declare, that I know nothing at all of the nature of cotton, and that I cannot conceive whence such a suspicion could arise, as I never was directly or indirectly concerned in any thing of the kind. One remark, however, naturally occurs upon the subject, and that is, that malevolence must have been greatly straitened for materials, when the placed so groundless an accusation at the head of her impeachment. The feebleness of her first effort is a presumption that her succeeding attacks will be still weaker and worse supported.

The second charge is, that I carried on an illegal trade in diamonds. Nothing can be a greater misrepresentation. The matter of fact is, that, in order to convey home the money arising from my jagheer, I sent my agents to a distant country, not under the jurisdiction of the company, and they bought up some diamonds, in which my property was vested, and transmitted to Europe. Upon balancing accounts, I found that they turned out worse by three per cent. than the original sum which they cost; a clear proof how well I was qualified for trade, and how eager I must in consequence have been in future time to refuse to gainful a branch of business. All this, if it should be called for by the House, and I have no objection to such a measure, I pledge myself to prove by original papers at your bar.

The third charge is, that I mismanaged the mint, and adulterated the coin in Bengal. During my presidency, some alteration was made in the state of the coin, I will own, but not at my instigation. Ignorant as I profess myself of that business, it would have ill become me to have been the original contriver of such a delicate operation of government. In that affair I was guided by the lights of others, whose particular employment and study might rationally be supposed to have made them masters of the subject.

The fourth charge is, that I was guilty of monopolizing beetle-nut, salt and tobacco. Here, I believe, the strength of the accusation of my adversaries lies: And, as I myself think it a matter of importance, I must beg the indulgence of the House, while I discuss it at large. They will hence see the superiority of my plan over that of the direction. I know not how it is, but either through obtuseness or ignorance, the gentlemen who have held the reins of government in Leadenhall, have acted so imprudent, so inconsistent a part, that they have deranged and frustrated the best concerted plans of regulation in Bengal. This I hope to make appear under this and other heads of my speech. It is urged, as my greatest and first crime, that I acted in diametrical opposition to the instructions received from the direction. Here are these instructions; it would be idle to read them all. The only paragraph deserving your attention is this: "You shall take from the company's servants the exclusive privilege of trading in beetle-nut, salt and tobacco, and settle it upon the footing the most equitable to the natives, and the most profitable to the company you can devise." From these words it will, I think, appear, that my instructions were not so precise and definitive, as absolutely to fix the mode of carrying on this trade. Being general, I gave them a liberal construction, making the interest of the company the sole standard by which every regulation was to be tried. Invested with extraordinary powers, I thought myself justified in consulting the spirit of those rules which were so indefinitely expressed; and, I trust, I did not altogether disappoint the expectations of my employers. The Privilege of trading in salt was claimed by the servants of the company as a necessary addition to their salary, which every body knows to be totally insufficient for their support. The appointments of a counsellor is only three hundred pounds, and his annual expenses cannot fall short of three thousand: The same proportion holds among the other servants. Hence, while Mr. Vanhantart was president, they set up for the first time this claim. Suja Dowla saw clearly, that if the company's servants were to carry on this trade free of every impost and restraint, while the native merchants paid large sums, the latter would be totally ruined, and his revenues from that article would dwindle to nothing. He therefore insisted upon the cessation of this privilege, else that he would lay the trade quite open. The company's servants declared that they would trade as formerly, without any restriction. Hence the war that followed, hence the origin of the select committee. Besides this grievance, there was another to be redressed. From time immemorial it has been a custom to give and take presents. An inferior can hardly be persuaded to approach a superior without a gift; the habit of despotism has formed their minds to this mode of transacting business. Accordingly, when the company's servants became the acting sovereigns of Bengal, and the channels through which favours passed they received presents, and thus indemnified themselves for the smallness of their salaries. The company thought that this practice had introduced many abuses; and therefore sent out covenants, which were to be signed by all their servants, and were to exclude them for ever after from accepting any presents by direct or indirect means. Thus deprived of their two main stays at once, of the salt trade and of presents, how were they to be supported? I saw and felt that some plan must be adopted; and none presented itself that seemed more effectual, or less expensive to the Company, than the appropriation of the money raised by the trade in beetle-nut, salt, or tobacco, put under proper regulations. In pursuance of this idea, I established this monopoly, for a monopoly is undoubtedly was; and I fixed the customs of the prices which it was to pay in the different parts of Bengal, as far as human fore-sight and regulation could go. Nor does it appear to me that the measure proved oppressive. Suppose the inhabitants of Bengal to be fifteen millions, according to the general calculation; the quantity of mounds of salt sold is known from the money which they produced, and from the books of the monopoly. At Calcutta the mound of salt sold at one price, at Patna at another, and at Mongheer at another, increasing in its price the farther it was carried up the river, or into the country. After a due allowance for every circumstance, I find that at a medium each person did not pay, in the course of the whole year, above one filling and nine pence for salt, an equal quantity being allowed to every individual. Now can this sum be thought excessive, in a country where a labourer's wages amount to six fillings a week, where almost no cloaths are worn, where no strong liquors are drank, where rice and milk, the sober food of the inhabitants, are comparatively cheap? The idea is absurd. Believe me, the monopoly did not bear hard upon the people, but upon the merchants. Thousands and thousands of them were thrown out of trade and reduced to distress; nor do I deny that the country agents exacted unreasonable profits, and enhanced the price of the commodity. Of that abuse the Select Committee was entirely guiltless; the duties established by them were more moderate and reasonable. Instead of adhering to this plan, what did the Directors do? They restored the trade to the natives, and continued the duties without collecting them. Had this object been properly attended to, the Treasury would have been this day a million and an half the richer; for that is the sum to which at a medium that revenue would now have amounted: But the gentlemen have been too much employed in securing an interest among the proprietors, to regard so trifling a consideration. Of this monopoly, I, as Governor, had a share, and the rest of the servants their due proportion. But how did I dispose of my share? I distributed it among men of merit, men who deserved well of me and their country. Three gentlemen I carried out with me, promising to make provision for them. One of them, Mr. Maskelyne, my Secretary, was the companion of my youth, the companion of my toils and dangers. We both served on the coast, we were both taken together, we both made our escape, we both fought under Boscawen at the siege of Pondicherry. Ill health obliged him to return home, and to relinquish all his prospects. When fortune had proved so kind to my endeavours, I thought it my duty to assist him out of my affluence. I did so; but something more seemed to be wanting. He attended me to Hindostan; and the whole of the thirty-two thousand pounds accruing to me from the monopoly of beetle-nut, salt, and tobacco, was shared between him, the other gentleman, and my surgeon, who left seven hundred pounds a year to serve me; and I do not think them too amply rewarded. Upon the whole, I distributed, you see, five thousand pounds more than I received; and all this I did that I might not be taxed with partiality, in order to advance my friends over the heads of other men. Nor is this all that I resigned. If ever Mussulmen loved a Christian, Meer Jaffar had a sincere affection for me. Finding himself near his end, he called his ministers, and in their presence declared, that, as a mark of his attachment, he bequeathed 70,000l. to Col. Clive. This sum I might have retained as my legal right, as I have been advised by the honourable Speaker, and by another personage, no less honourable, that does not sit in this house. This I formed into a fund for the support of officers, and disbanded and disabled soldiers; an establishment, by which they will now be enabled to return into their own country, and to live as comfortably as if they were pensioners of Chelsea hospital. This institution was the only thing wanted to put the military of the East-India Company upon a respectable footing, and to remove gloomy prospects from the mind of the old worn-out soldier.

[Thus far his Lordship's speech tends to justify his own conduct; the other part relates to the Company's affairs in the East, which we shall present our Readers with as soon as we can spare room.]

To the PRINTER of the St. James's Chronicle.

S. I. R,

THE entrance of Satan into Paradise was hardly more fatal to the human Race than that of the Arch-Traitor Lord Bute into the Royal Family; who, by perverting the mind, and tainting the principles of one Prince, and causing the others to be totally neglected, laid the foundation of that despotic plan of Government which is now advancing with hasty strides to the ruin of this kingdom. Had the present Parliament the public interest and happiness in view, instead of their own, they would make the infernal plot against the minds of the Royal Family a matter of the most serious inquiry; and if it should appear that his Majesty's education has been such as to tend to alienate his heart from the English subjects, and their excellent laws and constitution, and to lay the foundation of an arbitrary government; if it should appear that his Royal Brothers are not naturally deficient in understanding, but that they have been purposely and traitorously kept in ignorance to render them useless to the State, and to prevent their counteracting the plan of despotism, the whole weight of public vengeance ought to fall on the guilty heads of their governors and tutors; and their partisans and abettors should be branded with indelible infamy, and for ever cut off from the confidence of the nation.

JUS HUMANUM.

L O N D O N, APRIL 4.

THE TRIAL OF WILLIAM MORGAN, for the Murder of Miss MARY JONES, at Gloucester House, on Wednesday, March 11, 1772, before the Honourable GEORGE NARES.

THE following is the substance of the evidence produced against William Morgan:—THE deceased lady, Miss Mary Jones, was one of the daughters of a very respectable gentleman, Mr. Jones, and resided with her father at his house at Nais, in Gloucestershire. In July last Miss Harriet Gough happened to be upon a visit to Mr. Jones's on the 18th of that month, the young ladies went to take a walk as far as Lidney. As they walked up Lidney-street, it was observed that the prisoner at the bar was, together with some other persons, at the place where people play at five; he was seen to look at the ladies with some degree of attention. It seems that this 18th day of July was the day of the Monmouthshire election, and the young ladies had a desire to learn the event of an affair which had made a considerable noise in the country. With this view they called upon two or three different persons;—the last person they called upon was one Davis, a barber—at whose house they continued 'till very near ten o'clock. About this time they set out on their return to Nais; and within a quarter of an hour afterwards were observed, by one Mary Goodman, returning the same way they had gone when the prisoner had remarked them. Night being come on, and it being later than the ladies were accustomed to stay out, the family were become uneasy, and considerably alarmed. Two maids were sent out on the road towards Lidney, in hopes of meeting the ladies. The butler, John Edwards, was then called, and directed to take a light and go in search of them. He followed these directions, and soon after met the maid servants, and desired them to go on towards Lidney with him, which they declined doing, as it rained, and they were without their hats. Edwards proceeded on towards Lidney, and, in a piece of ground called East Marsh, he found the deceased, Miss Mary Jones, lying upon her face. He immediately put his hand to her head, and perceived that the hood of her cloak was filled with blood; he then called to her by her name, and no answer being made, he supposed her to be dead; and it occurred to him at that time that he might be killed by the cattle in the ground.

He then ran and called Mr. Corfe, an apothecary, who lives at Lidney, and brought him to the place where the body lay. Upon examination it was found that the young lady was quite dead, and that her death was occasioned by a violent fracture of the skull: Mr. Corfe then discovered that her pockets had been taken away, and that her watch hung by her petticoats. Near her person he found a very large oaken stick. To avoid the dreadful shock, which this discovery must inevitably give to Mr. Jones's family, they carried the body to the Vicarage-house.

By this time the town of Lidney was alarmed with the report of what had happened, and Richard Tamplin the constable being called, he searched the little public houses in Lidney, the usual resort of travellers and poor persons. It was remarked, that upon the alarm being spread, all the people in the town were up, except the prisoner and his father. This circumstance, together with what Mary Goodman declared of her having seen the prisoner at the five-place when the young ladies went up and returned, induced a suspicion of the prisoner having been concerned in the affair, and about five in the morning several persons went to the father's house. They there found one Ann Price, who was in bed. She was up, but the father of the prisoner and the mother were in bed. The constable called up the father, who came down to them, and soon afterwards called down his son, who came in a few minutes; when he got to the bottom of the stairs, he passed very quickly by the persons who were standing there. They asked him where he was going? he answered to them, "I am going to the five-place." He continued a quarter of an hour or near half an hour at the house it was observed, that there was the appearance of blood on his shoe, and upon the knee of his breeches; and being questioned how the blood came there, he answered, that his nose had lately bled.

Being asked whether his nose bled upon his shoe, he declared, that what they saw upon his shoe was not blood. They took it off, however, and upon examining it found it was stained with blood. They then proceeded towards the place where the body was found, and in passing through a piece of ground called the Vicarage Patch, some of the people examined a stake hedge in that piece, in search for the bottom of the stake which had been found near the body, and which appeared to have been broken short off. One of the persons discovering a stump, pulled it up, and produced it, saying, that was the piece of the stake; and thereupon the prisoner said, "No, by G. that was not it." The prisoner was then conducted to the Plume of Feathers inn in Lidney, where he was searched. One John Winter took out of his pocket a handkerchief marked H. G. and asking the prisoner whose it was, and how it came into his possession, he answered that it was his father's. He was then accused of being the murderer. He appeared to be staggered, and began to charge some other persons as having been concerned with him in the perpetration of the fact. However, very soon afterwards he confessed the whole, and acknowledged that he only was the guilty person, and that no other whatsoever had taken any part in the affair. Being pressed to tell where the pockets were, he said they were concealed in a budget, in which he and his father were used to put their working tools. Upon search made there, they were found, with some letters directed to Miss Mary Jones, and some to Miss Gough. These things being brought and produced to him, he was asked whether he had any thing else that belonged to the young ladies: he then produced a half guinea, five shillings in silver, and two pence in copper, and a knife with two blades. It being remarked that his waistcoat pocket appeared to be stuffed, upon search a white handkerchief with a red border, marked with the letters M. J. was found upon him. The next day the prisoner was carried before a Justice, where he freely and voluntarily most fully and amply confessed the whole affair. In the narrative of this dreadful transaction, there is a chasm, as to the immediate commission of the fact. This cannot be supplied. Miss Gough, the only person present at that dreadful moment except the prisoner himself, was so exceedingly alarmed by the attack, and so much stunned by the blows he received, that he was entirely deprived of her senses at that time, and has not now the smallest traces remaining in her memory of this frightful transaction.

The evidence being finished, the prisoner was asked what he had to say in his defence; his answer was, that the witnesses could not prove the fact against him; but the circumstances, in the opinion of the Jury, were so strong, that they brought him in guilty in a few minutes, and he received sentence of death, and suffered accordingly.

The following passage is taken from the speech made by the Hon. Judge Nares when he passed sentence on the above criminal:—The person whom you have murdered, and the manner in which the horrid deed hath been committed, are such aggravations of the crime, that history hath not yet furnished us, and, I hope to God, never will again with a similar instance of such amazing cruelty, such savage barbarity. It was no open or secret enemy, no sudden aggravating provocation, that could incite you to the commission of it; it was your friend and neighbour, and who was, almost at that very instant, breathing out from her benevolent heart the kindest wishes for your safety and preservation. In short, you have been that un-heard-of ruffian, that have murdered such youth and beauty, such innocence and virtue, as every other part of the human species would have flown to the protection of, and died to have preserved.
